

Introduction Hello, this is a short presentation on reading Crash through Plato's The Republic and part of a wip, that is exploring the CyberGothic.

The Republic Both Crash and The Republic must be read with some caution; The Republic, written long before the liberalism of the enlightenment, appears at the beginning as entirely redundant; we are tirelessly lulled into human betterment and might want to skip the scan of a lengthy brainwash but do carry on as the morality play swiftly takes form of a Greek tragedy and you suddenly wake in the totalitarian polis of Catherine and James Ballard. Plato is minecrafting the ideal state from the bottom up, starting with a small community of artisan farmers; however soon the exchange of basic needs does not meet the high standards of a European democracy anymore and we come to see specialization of atomic scale. At this point the relations to what matters most are elongated to such extent that the "language of everything" (Artaud) is no longer intelligible.

the milieu of the cave In tradition of Gothic horror and in possession of the technē of tunneling, J. G. Ballard is producing knowledge out of psychē (Öschuke); The analogy of the car accident serves to demonstrate possible effects of sensorial shutdown and sudden exposure to darkness, a hurtling from convertible space into the derelict depths of immutable time, haunted by a scarred and severely wounded soul. Vaughan is repelled by its own simulacra, which are deformed past all recognition and display most morbid behaviour, and yet do not want to refrain from driving. In consequence "The Good as Ultimate Object of Knowledge" (rep, 2007, 226) plots the rational act of murder and in time of death the transparency of the Real is splashing onto the windshield, which in-itself is opaque protective matter but porous in letting pass any arbitrary concept while its form is positioned towards the sun. The exploit shatters the defective interface into a multiplicity of undefined prisms, which are keys for possibilities of new perspectives and in a cascade of confetti welcome the reborn.

Mathematical reasoning (dianoia) in Ballard There is no doubt that Ballard utilizes the principle of the Good and strives for perfection, but his ideal writing proves all the more astonishing as Dianoia is frequently illustrated in his work. Many, if not all of his protagonists possess the extraordinary ability to detect a pleasant symmetry between the dreamed geometries of consciousness (architecture) and the anatomies of deformed bodies, which gives profound reason to accept, that both are the eerie structures of subconscious design. A truth to which baffled readers may not be privy and in consequence dismiss dianoia as weird visions of the eccentric, or even worse, equate frequent blurring of boundaries between life and unlife with sharp superimpositions of dead figures. Such infertile technology of informal machine learning furthers chronic progression of visible shadows in infirmary D, where C is observed and validated through temporal form and it must be held against the sun that diagnosis by medium of contrast is deduced from subjacent stages of the visible (horāton). To gain traction on life of sector C, which in fact remains immune to the strict isolation policy of a sclerotic Peras, it might be wise to keep the corpse uncovered and activate cooling function A (present /future) that in combination with Dianoia B allows for apyretic moving through forms to forms. Mathematical Formalism locates the transforming body across a maze of permanent geometries, in which in fit of self-actualisation is parading self-inflicted wounds for a wilful contamination with time to partake in the festivities of the NOW and all its infectious possibilities. In advanced stages of Dianoia, i.e. seizing the world as governing empire of interrelated signs, psuchē (©schuke) contracts discrete form, a condition which Hilbert diagnoses as "the intuitive a priori mode of thought" (Tasić 2001, 68).

Form in CyberGothic J. G. Ballard provokes thought with radical empiricism - steering eyes straight towards body fluids, genitalia, and senseless violence, full in line with the abysal terrors of petroculture, partly visible in the occidental mise en scène of car parks, flyovers and underpasses. If Crash is not acknowledged for exceeding literary excellence on account of Ballard's urge to abstraction (Abstraktionsdrang), it definitely generates likes for profit by satisfying the urge to empathy (Einfühlungsdrang). The two drives produce the respective aesthetics of Kunsts Schön and Naturschön; Worringer emphasises the importance of keeping the two lines apart, which are keys to a precise analysis of the psychological conditions of a society and urges to take a closer look at the forms of cultural products instead of being absorbed in the absurd but lucrative evaluation of pathological consumer behaviour. (wor, 2) One better takes fright in a scenario where Naturschön equals Kunsts Schön as Thanatos sits behind the steering wheel and encourages fascist simpleton to live out its passive sadistic voyeurism and find pleasure in a mindless bore of nature, or act of empathy (Einfühlungsakt). The death drive gets even more intense when all effort and life energy is turned outwards in awe of representation, (wor, 4) and indeed linguistic turns of a Neural Network can be quite impressive since it claims deep inquiries into the dimension of time and literally traces the organic aesthetic for smearing the human construct upon the physical world, which from the pole of spiritual perspective is both abstraction and shadow. Worringer insists on the inner "will to FORM" (form is noun!) as precondition of apperceptive activity, expressed in materialisation WITHIN the object. (wor, 8)

Conclusion Although no lesser geocentric than Plato, Ballard accepts the status of the sun as the center of control throughout life; and so it is featured on page 1 of Crash, where the sadistic star is already bleeding casualties. Plato is aware that the fire in the cave corresponds to the powers of the sun, (rep, 244) fueled from fossilized bones of (un)deceased cave dwellers; the alternative ending suggests ignition of the overheated machinic black sun and rebellion against guardian watchdogs in will to see the sun in-itself, and so the philosopher returns to the almost deserted home. Heraclitus and a cohesive underground movement of proletarian fire-worshippers are in favour to lose everything but their chains, holding the wisdom that the ring of fire must be handled with extreme caution. Peras colonialisises and terrorizes earth through atomic fission and extendible electromagnetic radiation, and extracts finitely from the harmonic flux of the indeterminate Dyad to turn dynamics into miniscule units of static being and drags the viscous mass far off the core for lone- and quarrelsome existence.

References

- [Art58] Antonin Artaud. The Theater and Its Double. Grove Press, 1958.
- [Bal14] J. G. Ballard. Crash. Fourth Estate, 2014.
- [Fis99] Mark Fisher. “Flatline Constructs - Gothic Materialism and Cybernetic Theory-Fiction”. PhD thesis. 1999.
- [Jen] Ernst Jentsch. *Zur Psychologie des Unheimlichen. URL: <https://www.sexuologie-info.de/artikel/2014.34.30.pdf>. (accessed 16/08/2026).
- [Pla07] Plato. The Republic. Penguin Classics, 2007.
- [Tas01] Vladimir Tasić. Mathematics and the Roots of Postmodern Thought. Oxford University Press, 2001.
- [Wor07] Wilhelm Worringer. Abstraktion und Einföhlung - Ein Beitrag zur Stilpsychologie. Heusersche Verlags-Druckerei, 1907.